Excerpt: .for working at depths of from 50 to 300 feet, where a large supply of water is required as in waterworks, or the sinking of shafts for mines; in tunnels, cfcc. The working barrel is within 10 ft. of the surface of the water. An iron windbore is bolted to the valve box, which is cast solid with the barrel in small sizes, but in large sizes a separate casting is bolted to the barrel. The foot and bucket valves are of the ordinary Cornish double beat equilibrium pattern, having faces of patent metal, so constructed that when worn they can be melted out, and a fresh seating cast in and faced up without affecting the main body of the valve. The working barrel is cast iron, strongly ribbed and accurately boreil, and its flanges are fuced and turned on the edges. The rising main, which is slightly larger in diameter than the working barrel, is of wrought iron with strong faced flanges; in small sizes, the pipes have welded, and in large sizes double rivetted longitudinal seams. AH bolt-holes in the pipe flanges are accurately drilled to a template, so that the pipes are interchangeable. When the pump is required for sinking the upper length of the rising main consists of a casting turned to fit a stuffing box, having feet to rest on a girder, which is placed across the well. The head of the pump resting in this way allows that portion...
