On the publication of Night and the Soul in a collected form, the Athenaeum fell foul of it in a very savage and unmerciful article. To this notice George Gilfillan, (who had taken an active part in launching the poem before the public,) lost no time in replying, through the columns of the Critic; and by being thus put upon his metal, he wrote much more carefully and tersely than it was usual for him to do. As one of the curiosities of literary criticism in the nineteenth century, the leading points on both sides are here reproduced. The writer in the Athenaeum says: --At present Mr. Bigg appears, in comparison of a real poet, what a London acrobat...
