Total paragraphs considered 40 Average words per paragraph 226-f Average words per sentence 54- It is probably useless to dispute whether, as Mr. Saintsbury says, Temple was a follower of Dryden, or whether, as Mr. C. D. Yonge thinks, Dryden imitated Sir William. Both men were probably indebted to Jonson, Cowley, and even Bunyan, though from Sir William s sentence-length one would hardly think so. What is certain for our purposes is that Temple s first important work, the Observations on the Netherlands (1672), is far more carefully paragraphed than the Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1667); and again that in ordering of matter Dryden s best work cannot compare with Temple s best. Temple s sentence is indeed too long; it is longer than Dryden s and more than twice as long as Fuller s. But the clauses follow the simple oral form, and for the first time in our prose we have a balance and a cadence that are not manifestly artificial. This unobtrusive balance and the parallel construction of sentences are an immense help structurally to the coherence of the paragraph. Of course the balance will now and then degenerate into an artificial pointedness that, by tending toward...
